" of doom. The mass of liberal sentiment is lost in a theological fog. But an educated American has never taken the world's great faiths lightly, confident in the wisdoms that an older civilization has discovered in ancient and more recent times. We have historically invented our own morals, without closely examining what others had thought. Today, with America the leading nation of the world's free population, we have taken on the burden of deciding what the rest of the world—and the rest of humanity—shall do. We are inventing what would be a new form of free enterprise when successful. The ideals America respects and honors lead nowhere else in the world. A sort of hypocrisy is believed to exist, to my mind, in the pride assumed by some Americans. They believe they constitute a parabolic, yet categorical act against hypocrisy. Like the Puritans, they emphasize inherent "innocence" in the American relation to the world. But he who never sins because he feels too bad, does not rise above and transcend the sin; he merely adjusts to it, and admits it as a fact. The position of others is not, to an American who desires perfection, a matter of protest. It is a matter of congratulation. But suppose the U.S. had missed the religious message and remained stuck inside liberalism? Suppose something like what happened to Europe had happened in America? The consequences would be terrible, of course. For the United States, however, this is impossible. There is nothing that anyone—even, I suppose, Mengele—could devise or do to touch the citizens of this nation. # 15 Crises of the United States We

Americans remember, increasingly, the strikes and the boycotts of the 1930s, the anemic advance of unions and progress-oriented efforts to provide decent wages and benefits. Before World War II, trade union activity was, in mature capitalism, relatively dead in the United States, a fact of life not ascribable to a Marxist conspiracy. Yet most Americans knew nothing of the heroic years of protest in Scandinavia and Great Britain, from the Russian Revolution of 1917 until defeat in the Second World War. This was probably the most successful period of social change, as workers made steady progress against their employers. The mild breakthrough of the 1930s was achieved with the organizing strength of hundreds of thousands of women
