And while 72 per cent of employers say their finances haven't been affected by the measures, that may be because less than half have read the guidance. Meanwhile, the vast majority of firms (82 per cent) are supportive of other countries' efforts to reduce tax avoidance and evasion. Overall, 94 per cent of respondents support other nations closing tax havens and 79 per cent believe that other countries should not rely on international cooperation to encourage domestic regulation of such activities. Key findings in the report include: Firms across all sectors and in all countries recognise the need to deal with tax avoidance and evasion, but support for the current international system is low across the board. As expected, finance directors are the most concerned about the impact of BEPS, followed by legal, compliance and HR directors. Seven in ten employers say their company's finances are not affected by BEPS. Overall, a large majority of employers in advanced economies say they are either not at all concerned or only slightly concerned by BEPS. In the UK, 64 per cent of employers are not concerned, 17 per cent are mildly concerned and 19 per cent strongly concerned. In France, 80 per cent of employers say they are not at all concerned; 8 per cent are moderately concerned; and just 12 per cent are strongly concerned. In Germany, only 11 per cent of employers are strongly concerned, and 37 per cent are mildly concerned. Employer attitudes in emerging markets are more positive, with the strongest support from firms in China (71 per cent), Brazil (67 per cent) and Russia (67 per cent).
