If I have a service that is a domain service, and there's a need for that service to communicate with a service that's at the grid level what kind of architecture will work best to manage that communication? A: It's okay to start out with simple RPC. Think about it this way: The two services are both on the same box. (in terms of architecture). The two services share a network. (in terms of distribution) Both services are the same on the inside. Both services can be different on the outside. In other words, in terms of architectural constraints, the services are very similar. The services have no local (or remote) dependencies, but have shared global dependencies. So, RPC is an appropriate architecture. But wait! If the two services are at different levels of a hierarchy, you should think about a different solution. Hierarchies are the top of the stack. These are the levels that exist in a classic top-d0c515b9f4

It is known in the art to coat various materials with graphite or carbon in order to increase the corrosion resistance of such materials. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,009,057 describes a method of coating a carbon or graphite coating on a steel article. Such patent teaches application of a specific hydrocarbon fuel or oil to the surface of a steel article which surface may be subsequently coated with a layer of graphite or carbon prior to painting or coating the article. This patent specifically includes as examples dibutyl carbinol and petroleum distillates including commercial
