The question of whether metals are toxic has far-reaching implications for environmental, public and occupational safety. In this study, we have investigated the cytotoxicity of nickel and copper in cultured human cells and assessed the effects of antioxidants, glutathione synthesis and cell health status on this toxicity. The results show that the concentrations of Ni(2+) and Cu(2+) tolerated by human cells in vitro are about an order of magnitude higher than those routinely detected in human blood plasma, and that these tolerable concentrations are no different, for Ni(2+) and Cu(2+), whether supplemented or not, in the medium. Depletion of glutathione levels below a critical threshold (50-70% of normal levels) had a cytotoxic effect on cells, but this effect was independent of metal concentration. Supplementing the medium with ascorbate or cysteine, or increasing the levels of glutathione or alpha-tocopherol in the culture medium, did not reduce the cytotoxicity of Ni(2+) or Cu(2+) for this range of concentrations. Our findings do not support the hypothesis that intracellular glutathione status
