Let's face it: to make this work, you're likely to need a digital camera and an expensive computer with a tripod or video camera.The Sega Dreamcast, Nintendo 64, Super Famicom (aka Nintendo 64 in the Americas), PlayStation, Sega Mega Drive, Super NES, Master System, PC Engine, Game Boy and Game Boy Color are hand-held video games consoles from Sega, Nintendo, Sony, and Philips released between 1985 and 1998.They're all region-free now but most are region-locked in the original release, as all of them used Sony/Philips, 16-bit Z.For the first time, CSIRO scientists have proven the existence of electrical fields in the atmosphere, using an unprecedented test. It's the strongest proof yet that atmospheric electricity is real. The new results, published in Science magazine, show that the greenhouse gas nitric oxide (NO) emits electrons, that these electrons have a small current, and that the current flows vertically from the troposphere into the stratosphere. This nitric oxide current, the scientists say, is very small compared to other electrical currents in the atmosphere – but it's there, nonetheless. The findings confirm that there's not only electricity in thunderstorms, but that a stable form of atmospheric electricity exists at different heights within the atmosphere. Dr Ray Davis, CSIRO's chief executive, said the discovery has implications for weather forecasting and communications. "The atmosphere is an enormous capacitor, capable of converting atmospheric energy into useful electricity," Dr Davis said. "Such energy has the potential to support future renewable energy and small scale renewable technology. This discovery will assist further studies into atmospheric electricity, and may one day inform how weather forecasts are made." NO is a by-product of natural processes such as the formation of volcanoes. In the atmosphere, it is thought to react with water to produce nitric acid and oxygen, forming tiny particles of aerosol that come to rest in the stratosphere and are deposited as nitrates. The CSIRO scientists used a special device called a 'corona discharge', a Faraday cage that concentrates the positive and

I saw some examples on stackexchange but I'm not very experienced in C++. I couldn't figure out how to write the function I need. I've seen this and this, but they don't do what I need. I need to write a function that searches for the first element that is greater than the ones in the list and then returns that item as a new node. So this is an example of what I need: list numbers = {0,1,1,2,1,3,1,4,2,2,2,5}; list >tree; tree.push_back(make_list(numbers)); tree.push_back(make_list(numbers)); tree.push_back(make_list(numbers)); tree.push_back(make_list(1cdb36666d
