and Crows? In New York City To some of the restaurant and chef communities, the boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn and Queens boast probably the greatest variety of dining experiences. In any one of these neighborhoods - the proverbial whole borough, mind you - you can eat at a fine dining restaurant, a casual ethnic restaurant, a variety of vegan, vegetarian, organic or not-quite organic eateries, and even a bar or two. You would never guess the many trash-based establishments that can be found in each one of those boroughs - especially if you only go where New Yorkers actually eat. All told, there are more than 1,500 restaurants and bars in the five boroughs. At that rate, I would expect at least two so-called grease traps (cover your ears if you hear this sentence in 2017). You see, New York City has a sizeable population of squirrels and pigeons. And if you rent an apartment in the city, you'll eventually - unless you do the humane thing and flush your catbox - witness the public reality of both the residents and the prowling animals. "Gail from Brooklyn" had one of the best first-person accounts I've read of eating at restaurants and experiencing the trash problem in NYC (this was submitted in November 2014, before 2013 or the current economy!). Food in NYC My husband and I moved to a country apartment in the city about five years ago. When we first moved here, I became familiar with pellet food for feral pigeons. I mentioned it to the landlord, who mentioned that is about it. A few weeks ago, I phoned the building management in a panic. I had just returned from three days in Norway on vacation. My husband had an emergency telephone call, so I was asked to check in with them. He came back soon after and said that there are huge flocks of roosting pigeons in our neighborhood and that it is now a nightmare. People are complaining. So my daughter has been keeping an eye on the pigeons and the garbage. My daughter told me about the food designed for pigeons. I have not yet tried it. The food is street vendor-smelling, and usually the pigeons like it, but not in our area. I sometimes smell it if I am walking by. I have not been too upset yet, though. We've learned to ignore them. Most of the street bins are empty and still
