The purpose of this position paper is to address the current issues regarding high-altitude (HA) nutrition and its recommended use in the high-performance athletic population. A working group of experienced HA nutritionists and sport dieticians and scientists met to review the current literature on HA nutrition, discuss the current mechanisms of adaptation to HA, and provide recommendations for both whole-body and isolated cell adaptations. Recommendations are provided for chronic and acute HA nutrition for athletes. The mechanism of adaptation to HA is multifaceted and includes an increase in red blood cell volume, an increase in the erythrocyte concentration of O₂, an increase in the oxygen-carrying capacity of blood, and increased intracellular and extracellular fluid volumes. The improved erythropoiesis in subjects acclimated to HA leads to hypoxic tolerance in cells of a
