The vast majority of CS6 users use Photoshop Lightroom for their workflow. Although Photoshop is the preferred image-editing tool for professional photographers and many image editing professionals, many photographers and image editors rely on Lightroom as an all-purpose tool. Organize your files With virtually no limit on the number of files you can have open, whether for the purpose of editing or for viewing, Photoshop is a beast. In fact, the best way to avoid file-organizing problems is to keep all your original files in their native RAW format. You can see the files in Finder, as a single folder, or you can even manage them inside a Photoshop document. After you have all your images in one place, you're ready to begin the most important step of the editing process — organizing. Aperture and Photoshop work with the same basic system: Just as with files in Aperture, images stored inside a Photoshop document are organized into layers. The layers within a document represent distinct states of an image and apply to that image only. For example, a layer can represent a copy of a picture or a change you made to an existing image. Consider the following case: You have two photos, both of which you have tagged as "1," and you want to apply three different changes to each image, resulting in three new files that are named "1-a," "1-b," and "1-c." You might do this process: 1. Create a new document for each of the new images and name them 1-a, 1-b, and 1-c. 2. Rename the two original photos to 1-a and 1-b. 3. Apply the three changes to each of the new files: Artistic, Photo Architectural, and Close-Up. After you have created these three new images, what's the only way to store them? You can create a new file called 1-a, 1-b, and 1-c, but that isn't very useful because you'll need to click their layers to open them in the image window. You can store them in a folder, or you can add them to an existing Photoshop document and save them there as a single image. When you use an existing Photoshop document for your images, you can even name the file after the step you just completed: 1-a, 1-b, and 1-c. Now you can easily open each

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an apparatus and method of managing cryptographic keys and cryptographic message authentication codes for cryptographic processing of a physical layer transmission frame of a communication network, and more particularly, to an apparatus and method of managing a plurality of different cryptographic keys for different cryptographic processing of transmission frames of a plurality of different services and managing a plurality of different cryptographic message authentication codes for different authentication processing of transmission frames of the different services. 2. Description of the Related Art Wireless communication networks are becoming increasingly important for communication networks. When a large number of people attempt to access a wireless communication network simultaneously, network congestion can occur. For example, when a large number of wireless terminals attempt to connect to the Internet simultaneously, the wireless networks may become saturated, and some of the terminals may not be able to connect to the Internet. Furthermore, the wireless network will have difficulty providing high data rate communications. To prevent or reduce the occurrence of congestion, the wireless networks have multiple security features, such as encryption. The wireless communication devices can use their unique identifiers to send a message that is encrypted. The encrypted message, however, needs to be transmitted securely. Before the encrypted message is transmitted, the encrypted message is first authenticated. To make the encrypted messages more secure, the cryptographic keys are periodically updated. When cryptographic processing is performed by a wireless communication device, the cryptographic processing is performed on a physical layer transmission frame that is transmitted to a radio access point (RAP). The radio access point (RAP) is connected to the wireless network and is responsible for relaying data from the wireless communication devices (e.g., the wireless terminals) to the wired backbone and vice versa. Because the radio access point (RAP) is responsible for transmitting the data to the wireless network, the radio access point (RAP) has an effective role in preventing the occurrence of congestion and in transmitting encrypted and authenticated messages securely. One problem with using a cryptographic key for the cryptographic processing is that it cannot be changed easily. Once a wireless terminal acquires the cryptographic key, the wireless terminal is unable to change the key easily. Because the authentication and encryption is performed on the transmission frames when the wireless terminal transmits the frames to the radio access point (RAP), it is very important to change the cryptographic key. Furthermore, once a cryptographic key is used, the wireless terminal cannot use a new cryptographic key. Therefore, the wireless terminal cannot encrypt new messages with the old cryptographic key and is unable to authenticate transmitted messages
