Autodesk Revit Revit is a suite of software products developed by Autodesk. It is a design software platform that supports the creation, design, documentation, and analysis of building information modeling (BIM). The term BIM is short for Building Information Model. Revit is primarily used to produce both 2D and 3D construction documentation and models for buildings and other architectural projects. It also supports business process management, project collaboration, and plant design. Revit can model the mechanical and electrical components of an entire building or complex. It also has the ability to model the components of an entire building and then package the building models into a set of assemblies. In 2012 Autodesk launched a free Revit Viewer. In 2016 Autodesk introduced a free, web-based BIM tool called Autodesk DWF Viewer. Autodesk Navisworks Navisworks is a project-focused, multi-disciplinary, and multi-platform BIM software application. It supports the 3D modeling, detailing, virtual visualization, and documentation of buildings and other architectural projects. It can also create BIM models for hydraulic and electrical systems, and from which piping, lighting, and electrical systems can be extracted. These components can be reused in future projects. Revit Server Revit Server is a component of the Revit BIM suite. It allows organizations to use the Revit client on multiple devices, from a local computer to a mobile device. The software can also be used remotely to model data at a remote location, and keep Revit documents up to date and synchronized across devices. A free trial version is available for download on the Autodesk website, as well as free online accounts. Revit Server also allows organization users to work together on a single project, and allows users to collaborate. It also allows teams to share documents, and keep files updated across multiple users. 3DS Max 3DS Max is a feature-rich and comprehensive 3D modeling, rendering and animation software package from Autodesk. In America, the accessibility of legal abortion is a huge win for women's rights. However, in India, the country that supposedly gave birth to abortion, it is another story. In a country where around half of pregnancies are not wanted, women are forced to abort their babies. Some even go to the extent of selling their newborn babies to adopt them out. In this episode of Waking The Feminist, we discuss one of the biggest issues in India, that of male foeticide. In a country that has such a huge problem with population control, gender selection is an epidemic. Due to its huge population, India has one of the largest sex ratio problems in the world. Most people would not even know that one out of every four babies born in India is not a girl. While a normal distribution of sex between males and females is around 105:100, in India it is 111:100 and the number is rising. This is happening because many families abort male babies because the gender of the child does not match the gender of the parents. It has a huge impact on family life and, of course, on society. When the ratio is skewed towards more boys, this means more males than females are competing for jobs and status. Since it is easier to be a boy in India, more families choose to abort male babies than female. This then has a domino effect because the next generation is made up of even more boys. In one case, a baby was actually sold to an unsuspecting couple who had two daughters. It is amazing that the family only found out after the child was three years old! Girls are being aborted at a rate of almost one per minute. Babies are killed not because they are unwanted, but because they do not meet gender expectations. In most cases, the baby is aborted and the parents then give the body away to someone else who can provide a womb for the baby. A recent report by the CBS and The Times of India found that around 200,000 babies are sold in this way every year. While some girls are kept and given up by their families, others are sold to others. It's all very sad and, in many cases, tragic. The country has an extremely high rate of female foeticide, meaning that girls are being aborted. More than 50 percent of babies born to women in the 20-24 age bracket are not girls. This causes a huge problem
